Based on fifteen years of audience research, the authors provide an in-depth description of what people do with news and how this has diversified over time, from reading, watching and listening to a broader spectrum of user practices including checking, scrolling, tagging, and avoiding. By emphasizing people's own experience of journalism, this book also investigates what two prominent audience measurements - clicking and spending time - mean from a user perspective. The book outlines ways to overcome the dilemma of providing what people apparently want (attention-grabbing news features) and delivering what people apparently need (what journalists see as important information), suggesting alternative ways to investigate and become sensitive to the practices, preferences and pleasures of audiences and discussing what these research findings might mean for everyday journalism practice. The book is a valuable and timely resource for academics and researchers interested in the fields of journalism studies, sociology, digital media, and communication". Saturs: 1: Introduction: Changing news use, unchanged news experiences? ; 2: Scrolling, triangulating, tagging and abstaining: The diversification of news use between 2004-2020 ; 3: What clicking actually means ; 4: A user perspective on Time Spent: Temporal experiences of everyday news use ; 5: Material and sensory dimensions of everyday news use ; 6: How to deal with news user practices, preferences and pleasures? Applying an innovative longitudinal set-theoretical methodological approach, the book contributes to the theory of media systems with a novel theoretical framework for the comparative analysis of post-socialist media systems. This theory builds on the theory of historical institutionalism and the notion of critical junctures and path dependency in searching for an explanation for similarities or differences among media systems in the Eastern European region. Extending the understanding of media systems beyond a political journalism focus, this book is a valuable contribution to the literature on comparative media systems in the areas of media systems studies, political science, Southeast and Central European studies, post-socialist studies and communication studies.
